

“Prayer, at this day, in pure resignation, is a precious place: the trumpet is sounded, the call goes forth to the church, that she gather to the place of pure inward prayer; and her habitation is safe.”

C H A P. XI.

His preparing to visit friends in England—His embarking at Chester, in company with Samuel Emlen, in a ship bound to London—His deep exercise, in observing the difficulties and hardships the common sailors are exposed to—Considerations on the dangers to which youth are exposed, in being trained to a sea-faring life; and its inconsistency with a pious education—His thoughts in a storm at sea: with many instructive contemplations on the voyage—And his arrival at London.

HAVING been some time under a religious concern to prepare for crossing the seas, in order to visit friends in the northern parts of England, and more particularly in Yorkshire: after weighty consideration, I thought it expedient to inform friends, at our
