

C O N T E N T S.

xvii

Chap. LV. How easy a matter it is to govern a State where the People are not corrupted; how hard to erect a Principality where there is an equality amongst them; and that where there is no equality, a Commonwealth cannot be established,

Page 130

Chap. LVI. Before any great misfortune befalls a State, it is generally either prognosticated by some Portent, or foretold by some particular Person or other,

134

Chap. LVII. The Multitude united is strong and formidable; but separated it is weak and contemptible,

144

Chap. LVIII. That the Multitude are wiser and more constant in general than a Prince,

145

Chap. LIX. Whether an Alliance made with a Prince or a Commonwealth is most to be confided in,

151

Chap. LX. That the Consulship and all other Dignities in Rome were conferred without respect of age,

153

The Contents of the Second Book of Political Discourses.

THE Preface,

159

Chap. I. Whether the grandeur of the Roman Empire may be ascribed to the Virtue or good Fortune of that people,

163

Chap. II. With what Nations the Romans were engaged in their wars; and how obstinately those Nations defended their liberties against them,

166

Chap. III. That Rome made itself strong and powerful by destroying the States round about it, and incorporating strangers with its own Citizens,

180

Chap. IV. Concerning the three ways which Republics have taken to extend their Dominion,

182

Chap. V. That Deluges, Pestilences, the change of Religion and Languages, and other accidents, in a manner extinguish the memory of many things,

186

Chap. VI. Concerning the conduct observed by the Romans in their Wars,

189

Chap. VII. What proportion of land the Romans gave to every inhabitant of their Colonies,

191

VOL. II.

c

Chap.