

in which she passed the remainder of her life in restfulness, devoting her time and her talents, - a vigorous intellect and a good constitution, to her Lord and Saviour, and to His church and His work wherever it came to her hand. Here she set in operation the earliest movements for the establishing of the Baptist Home for aged women, of which she was the first President, and in which as she died before its final completion, I furnished a room in her memory, in which her portrait still hangs.

The pretty Library in this home on Eighth St., is inseparably connected with her personality; and the ever present picture is the evening hour, sitting around the table, with her dear self in her rocking chair, reading, or darning the family stockings - which task she voluntarily assumed, - or engaged in other needle work. On her seventy-seventh birth-day, she had a tea-party inviting her dearest friends. As the dining room was small, I had the supper table set in the Library, with a large birth-day
