

for some years it occupied a similar position in their home at Walnut and Sixteenth Streets. On our marriage, it was given to us, and stood in our front room on the third story of the same house. On our going to house-keeping at 325 South Eighteenth Street, it had a place in the Library, between the windows, and in our home in Delancey Place, in the dining room. It was originally several inches higher than now, we having had it cut down to suit the height of our room. This is the table which appears in the portrait of Mrs. Eliza Lewis. She stands resting her arm on it. The embroidered Quaker scarf, which she wore at the time of her sitting, is now in possession of Mrs. John A. Lewis. The empire mahogany chair inlaid with brass, like the table, were its associates for many years, and still keep company with it in our dining room.
