

Mr. Meyer's Fast.

1. When Meyer reads in the paper about people making themselves famous by long fasts, and decides that he will surpass the record.

2. He tells his wife his decision, and, notwithstanding her efforts to dissuade him, at once begins to fast.

3. He has sent for the family physician, who examines Meyer, finds no trace of insanity, and everything about him normal.

4. A sympathetic neighbor drops in, and the two decide not to interfere with Meyer's fast. But the physician says he must see Meyer's Sarsaparilla to keep his strength up.

5. For scientific purposes they weigh and measure him, find his temperature, and give him the first dose of Hood's Sarsaparilla.

6. Mrs. Meyer invites the two visitors to dinner with her. This is the critical test for Meyer. But his family believe that, with the aid of Hood's Sarsaparilla, he will be strong enough to resist temptation to eat.

7. But the machine has an effect he did not think of. It causes his appetite so that he feels that, in spite of his fast, he is comfortable. They have never known and their disapproval, and that is his favorite dinner.

8. He goes to the table and says he will continue to fast except on days when they have more meat and less Sarsaparilla. They laugh and tell him to go take another dose of Hood's Sarsaparilla.

9. His appetite becomes so great that he rushes to the table and eating and drinking as usual. He has now begun to attack the very thing he fasted for.

10. Mrs. Meyer is prepared with another dish of liver Sarsaparilla, and they are all surprised at the recovery of Hood's Sarsaparilla in breaking up Mr. Meyer's fast.
